AN ADROIT THIEF

Mary Jones, a colored damsel of rather agreeable appearance for one of her race, has been playing a game the past month or so that has exhibited in its conception a degree of shrewdness far beyond what might have been expected of one of her opportunities.

Mary's success was due to the adroit manner than the color of the properties of the color of the co in which she approached her victims—always tastily dressed ladies—and would, perhaps, have never been discovered but for the fact that she selected a lady on one occasion who kept her eyes about her, and watching too At Troy—Troys, 3; Providences, 5.

kept her eyes about her, and watching too closely the woman's movements, discovering her abstracting her money from her pocket. A direct accusation and prompt return of the money on demand let Mary out of a bad scrape, but, unfortunately, did not deter her from resuming her nefarious occupation on the first opportunity. Her scheme was thuswise: She stationed therapit on one of the popular theory where ladies Baralyzed the Pool-Sellers.

It was a clever trick that was played on the pool-sellers, Keily and Bliss, the other day. During the Monmouth Park meeting some artful dodger tapped the wire to their rooms, and intercepted the message that Ripple had won the Shrewsbury stakes, sending instead the information that Krupp Gun had won. The usual precautionary message of inquiry from the room as to the correctness of the report was duly affirmatively anocketbook, loose change, valuable handkershield, or whatever etse her fancy might covet, and get away with it without detection. The case in which she was caught led to her ultimate detection, though it was a long time timate detection, though it was a long time before the officials got on her track.
